The Epiphany.

A stable's a good place for revelations.

Some of the most profound discoveries are made in back rooms, half by accident, by people half-exhausted, looking for something else.

Just as we felt like giving up, when the whole thing had become ridiculous and had gone on much too long, and we were blaming everybody else for our mistakes, we came upon the unexpected answer in the most unlikely place: a speechless, thoughtless, helpless child who just lay there, needing to be loved.

In this subversion of all natural things was born the enabling power of sacrifice—a being whose ambition was to seek its own destruction, and then call upon his followers to do no more or less.

What kind of way was this to rule a world?
He just lay there, needing to be loved.

It must be stopped: each Herod would conspire to kill it when it cannot be tempted with possessions or subdued with pain, or lulled to sleep with alcohol or television.

Here was something we could not buy or cure, digitise, transplant, upgrade, invest in, analyse or write a business plan for.

He had no army, text-book, voters' mandate or computer markup language with which to implement his great design:

he just lay there, needing to be loved.

It was the most implausible demand.
Anything else we might negotiate but not this life of grace secured through death: grace, born out of deprivation, grace born of the endurance of the oppressed, grace born of the hardships of the poor, grace born of the forgiveness of the intolerable, grace borne in the dignity of silence, grace born from incomprehensible submission to the absolute abuse of power.
In the strength of his weakness
he just lay there, needing to be loved.

Aeons after energy exploded into matter here in this stable was let loose the yet more potent power of perfect love,

Our gifts were tokens. There was nothing more to do but leave the child to his own terrible story, and return by different routes to our own countries, strangers to us now, yet seeing them as if for the first time, how they just lie there, needing to be loved.
